Trait Skills: The Secret Ingredient to a Productive Workforce

New York, NY | January 5, 2015: Dharma Life Sciences, L.L.C., a thought leader in Personal Development, announced today that it has launched its first Trait Skills Management Program for developing Trait Skills in Employees, an individual skillset required to successfully increase employee productivity and achieve organizational efficiency.

Organizations and employees have aspirations and goals that they want to accomplish. To realize these goals both the organization and the employees prize two types of skills: technical skills and soft skills. The right combination of technical skills and soft skills, determined by the job role, comprise the ideal, productive employee.

“Although an organization’s employees have the technical skills and soft skills to perform their jobs, they are not sufficient without the third skill-set,” said J. Sasidhar, CEO and Founder of Dharma Life Sciences. “Through scientific and field research experience we have discovered and proved that Trait Skills are the secret ingredient to an efficient, productive workforce.”

Every individual develops unbalanced traits by the genes they inherit, their past environment and how their minds work. These traits need to be balanced for an individual, as they tend to drain their energy and defocus them from their goals. Organizations are ultimately affected, as collectively the traits in employees hamper organizational productivity and eventually its goals.

Dharma Life programs identify and develop trait skills that are required to increase the efficiency of employees and make them into a coherent, productive group for the organization. The program, based around scientifically-proven actions, seamlessly integrates with other development plans currently established in an organization. With a success rate of 70% per individual, Dharma Life programs have proven effective, helping over 1,000 individuals from various organizations.
